CHICKERING HALL-JOSEFFY.

Herr Joseffy has created a marked impression in New York musical circles, and has won his way to an emphatic success by sheer force of excellence, There are those who declare him to be a "revela and who place him as the equal of Liszt and the other great masters of the century, and after witnessing the enthusiasm which necompanies his performances one can readily understand how an audience is carried away by the magnetism of his skill. His popular ess has been absolute, and amateur and even professional critics have gone to great lengths displace a Liszt or a Von Bulow or a Rubinstein to make a place for Joseffy, or to compare the latter to the advantage or disadvantage of the great men of the musical world, in order to determine his standing. The question is not whether he possesses more or less genius than those who have gone before, but whether his musical conceptions and his technical expression of them are correct when compared with artistic standards. The comparison should be artistic, not personal. Judged by these truer methods he has not been found wanting, and he has proven himself thorough and conscientions and possessed of a superb technique and exquisite taste. The usual exhibitions of his powers has been in Chopin's and Lisz's music, and he has given but little opportunity, thus far, for a judgment on his capabilities as an interpreter of Beethoven. On reading his programmes the absence of Beethoven is marked—but one selection appearing in his many concerts—and this fact gave rise to the suggestion that he was not, in that school, at his best. While he has not deferred to public opinion by placing the great master on his programmes frequently, he has now twice played his E flat concerto in a manner that settles the matter definitely. Opinions are not unanimous, perhaps; a bit of coloring here should be deopened or lightened, according to one or another critic, and the soul of the composer is not invariably apparent to some of over nice perceptions, but to point to flaws in Jossify's playing—flaws which undoubtedly exist, as blemishes are absolutely present in things apparently faultless—is to distort criticism to more fault finding, and to carry nicety of opinion to a ridiculous extreme. The opinion already expressed of his playing can be repeated as to his last evening's rendering of the concerto. He played it with the soul and feeling of one great master interpreting another; the performance was even and finished throughout, expressive and complete, and was the crowning glory of the work that he has done heretotore. Chopin's concerto in E minor was played on the occasion of his debut, and there was then a trace of nervousness in his execution of the opening passages which was not apparent last evening. The impression first made was tully confirmed on ot whether he possesses more or less genius than those who have gone before, but whether his mu-

Of the entire programme former criticisms may simply be repeated. It is a difficult matter to criticise such a player for reasons given above. His methods are so nice and his execution so exact that to detect his flaws would require an extended analysis of every phrase of the lengthy concerto, and even such a criticism would after mighty throes give forth but such a result as did the mountain of the fable.

give forth but such a result as did the mountain of the fable.

Herr Joseffy will always be remembered pleasantly by New Yorkers for the compliment he paid to their musical tastes by coming to them for their indorsement before visiting Paris or London, his reputation of to-day being based on the verdict of Vienna and New York.

The orchestra in the entire performance did itself great credit and played with marked expression and facility. But little space is accorded the orchestra in this notice, for the reason that Joseffy is about to leave the country, while they will be heard shortly in a number of concerts, when their excellent playing ca. be referred to at length.

drew a crowded house. Shakespeare's comedy of sents an artist of her winsome exterior with an irresistible temptation. Hence Viand Rosalind have prominent places in her répertoire. Her performance of last evening was replete with that boyish-girlish grace which the part demands, and its excellence was warmly recognized. Mr. Compton made a od enough to be noted as a strong feature of the re were now alive to take the work of his hands called "Twelfth Night or What You Will," and make a compact comedy of it. We know not how many Shakespearians will start up at the bare thought and say, "Marry, come up" or "go to," and will forthwith offer to prove the relevancy of every line. And we should in the end, abashed, admit our fault. Of course we should, if we argued at all, insist that no mortal hand but Shakespeare's should do the work. We know what one named Tobin—a Bronson Howard of hit day—did with this comedy and that other, "The laming of the Shrew," when he turned viola into Zamora and Petruchio into the Duke Aranza, and cailed the compost the "Honoymoon." It was far from a bad comedy, but then how are it was from Shakespeare also? Who indeed should after a word against the casket which contains the gem, Viola? That exquisite creation, at once so delicate in its maidenliness, so fresh in its bayishness, of such strong fibre in its depth of womanliness, appeals against the descertion. Fancy plays around her like a springtide breeze; the very lears that filt across her path make low music with their wings. Arch boy or pleading woman, she touches the heart with joyonaness, or that strange pleasure which follows a moment's pain. Miss Neilson's impersonation is lainly and yet sufficing. The tendency to overact the boy, in the attempt to remove it from framinity, she avoids, and yet so defity does she touch the balance of the part that to Olyica, to the men she meets, she is a gentle youth, while to the audience the throbbings of the woman his amuses, half alarms her, the succession of grilish emotions was finely indicated, the startled look melting into irrepressible miles as the absurdity of the situation overspread its serious import. In the scenes with Osino the staggestion of suppressed emotion was admirable and the well known lines beginning "Ste never told her love" were given with a quiet but marvelleusly inflected into ation which touched the keynote of the character with race felicity. Is it not indeed that of a woman patient, and "suffi called "Twelfth Night or What You Will," and make compact comedy of it. We know not how many pearians will start up at the bare thought and

Last night was exceptionally interesting because it was to reintroduce to the public the regular company, which has been travelling for several months, swinging about a circle that includes Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia and their dependencies. It had cago, ranadajana and their departments. I have been officially announced that the management proposed making this theatre a home for the eelectic drama, and its habitues flocked in goodly array to witness the first step in its departure from the realm of sentiment and "contemporaneous human interest." The house, the audience, the play and the actors deserve critical attention, and claim it in the order given. During the long summer recess, which began unusually early and lasted unusually long, the theatre was thoroughly cleansed, elaborately painted, neatly decorated, comfortably furnished, and put in a sweet and whole some condition. With freshly upholstered boxes and a general atmosphere of elegance and refinement the cosey theatre was thrown open last evening, and almost instantly filled from orchestra to rooftree. The audience was in many respects notable, includof hie and occupation. The appearance of Mr. Tis-sington was warmly applauded, and after the open-

The story of a play like "French Flats" affords but little indication of its own merits or demerits. It is a story written not to be read, but to be realized upon the stage. A synopsis of that story, therefore, can convey but a very imperfect notion of the play When the curtain rises on the first act we as such. When the curtain rises on the first act we see the dining room of the first flat of a large manison. Into this flat the family of M. Blondeau are moving. All the bustle and incoherence of the first of May are there. It soon appears that this M. Blondeau has just purchased this house with funds accumulated by him in the useful though not remantic pursuit of button making. Before the first half of the first act is over we learn that this same M. Blondeau was originally a barber, and that he is ashamed of that honorable fact, and very fearful that his second wife—a lady of the best society, who married him for his money—shall hear of it. He has purchased this French flat house to have a home of his own, and to live in "peace, concord and tranquillity." Suddenly the occupant of the third floor or flat, a legal gentleman, named Bonay, enters upon the confused scene with a complaint against the Baroness de St. Amaranthe, who occupies the second story. He holds this lady to be a suspicious character, on "suspiciously intimate terms with the occupant of the fourth story, a tenor of the grand Italian opera, named Riffardini. Poor Blondeau, in his love of respectability, authorizes Bonay to give this lady notice to quit. This notice is conveyed by a clerk of Bonay, and the lady, rate at the insult, gets up a regular charivari on the second story, and on the pandemonium the curtain drops. The second act brings us to the second story of the house. There we see the Baroness, aided by her maid and a suitor for the hand of Blondeau's daughter, hard at work making the noises that were heard at the close of the first act. It appears that in a moment of infatuation this suitor, one M. Vallay, sued for the hand of the Baroness while engaged to Biondeau's daughter. He is trying to recover the proofs of his folly when suddenly the angered Biondeau is announced. Afraid of being seen by him, Vallay rushes into an adjoining room. The Baroness, leaving her maid to receive the landord, crits into another room. The old man enter see the dining room of the first flat of a large man-being given at the New York Circus, on the premises formerly known as Heller's Hall, and later as the Globe Theatre, opposite the New York Hotel. The auditorium has undergone but slight change, but the stage has been transformed into a ring, and here one sees repeated the equestrian and athietic performances with which every school boy is more or less sees repeated the equestrian and atmetic performances with which every school boy is more or loss familiar. The place was opened on Monday night in the presence of a large audience and an equally large audience assembled last evening. It cannot be said that Mr. L. B. Lent, the manager, has introduced any new features. The clowns crack their old jokes, the regulation number of paper balloons are burst, the educated ponies and trick horses go through their customary programme to the delight of the little folks, and down to the music of the band we have the old fashioned circus just as we saw it twenty years ago. The performance hast evening embraced among its chief attractions a juvenile entrie, introducing ten boys mounted on ponies; exercises on a barrel by Miss Lizzie Marcellus; some excellent riding by Miss Lizzie Marcellus; some excellent riding by Miss Lizzie Marcellus; some excellent riding by Miss Emma Lake, and a good specimen of juggling on horseleach by Miss Pauline Lee. Gymnastic exercises were induiged in by Messrs. Levantine and Earl, an aerial set was performed by Senorita Milhe Turnour, and dashing riding done by Messra, Gorman and Sebastian. It is the intention of Mr. Lent to remain here during a greater portion of the winter. He has only to present the novelties peculiar to his department of the show business to insure the success of his venture.
